

Now even Lauren dropped her smile. She turned her back to Mia and exchanged glances with Savannah and Gabriella.

Mia sighed. Now she'd have to skulk back to Jess and hear about how right she'd been.

She was about to go when Lauren flicked her hair. Mia was right behind her and if there had been anything underneath she'd have seen it. But there was nothing.

Mia's heart sank. It meant she'd imagined it yesterday.

She stomped back across the playground, her shoulders slumped, and planted her hands in her pockets.

The best thing now would be to forget about the Queens and move on. But how could she forget what she'd seen?

The day before, she'd been walking home from school. The Queens had been a few paces ahead, talking quietly as usual.

