

Nigel's robotic hand is controlled using the muscles in his upper arm and moves just like a real hand.

It works so well that Nigel can peel vegetables, type on a computer and even tie his own shoelaces again.

Robotic legs are used to help soldiers who have hurt their legs in battle.

The US army is thinking about replacing 25 per cent of its soldiers with robots by 2040.

